IT was up to Nifty Neaps to see that all was in readiness for his pals with the guns and sacks to appear in an hour and take away the plunder. They'd figured on lifting the jewels and art treasures of Miss Perdita Palmer, wealthiest of orphaned debutantes, and even had chosen in advance the fence who would pay the most for such treasures. But was Perdita Palmer at home or away? Nifty, who was reckoned a fast worker with women of all classes of society, had been sent ahead to find out.

He rang the doorbell. Silence, then the door opened. He faced a lovely blonde creature in an expensive frock.

She was at home, then. Was she alone? Nifty must find out.

"Good day, ma'am," he said glibly. "I'm making a public opinion survey for the Canter Poll. We're concentrating for this one on attractive young women—"

"Please come in," she said quickly, almost as though she feared he would refuse.

Entering, he took off his hat. "Your family here?" he asked.

"I'm an orphan," she said.

"I mean—servants?"

"This is their day off. Please sit down, Mr.—"

"Terwilliger," he improvised, and took a chair. A glance around the room revealed two priceless paintings on the walls, an antique gold candlestick. Perdita Palmer herself wore rings, a pendant and ear-bobs, all set with diamonds. Nifty fought hard to keep from licking his lips.

"Won't you have some tea?" she was fairly begging, and lifted a silver pot from a tray.

"Thanks," he said. "Now, Miss, I have questions to ask."

"Oh!" and she smiled bewitchingly. "Don't let's talk business. This is more of a social event. Tell me about yourself. You must be a fascinating person."

"You may be right," he smirked. In the back of his head he wondered if he wasn't getting even better than formerly at charming the fair sex. This gorgeous heiress seemed to be falling for him, hard.

Nifty rose to such an opportunity. He heaped lie upon lie, portraying himself as a romantic, educated man, who was working on the poll only to gather material for a novel. Perdita Palmer seemed to drink in his every word as though her life depended on it. In spite of himself, he was intoxicated with her nearness.

The Stars

An inspiration grew within him. Say, why not double-cross the gang? Send them word that the place was guarded—then go ahead and complete the conquest of Perdita Palmer? A lovely dish like that, with all the money, dazzled him. She was even worth going straight for.

"You know," he said, "this is really a big thing for me, meeting someone like you."

"I'm so glad to hear it," she cooed. "Have you been hospitably entertained?"

"I sure have. Now, I was thinking, Perdita, why don't we get better acquainted? How about a kiss?"

"You've been hospitably entertained? You swear to that?"

"I sure do. And—"

She hit him with the silver teapot.

Nifty yelled with pain and surprise, and tried to reach for the gun under his coat. Another blow with the teapot knocked him flat. He rose to hands and knees, and a third blow, straight on top of the head, sent his senses flying from him.

He regained consciousness, to find himself with a splitting headache and a police surgeon stooping over him.

"He isn't badly injured, worse luck," said the surgeon. "We can take him to jail."

Perdita was speaking to a hard-faced detective. "I knew he was Nifty Neaps the moment I set eyes on him," she said.

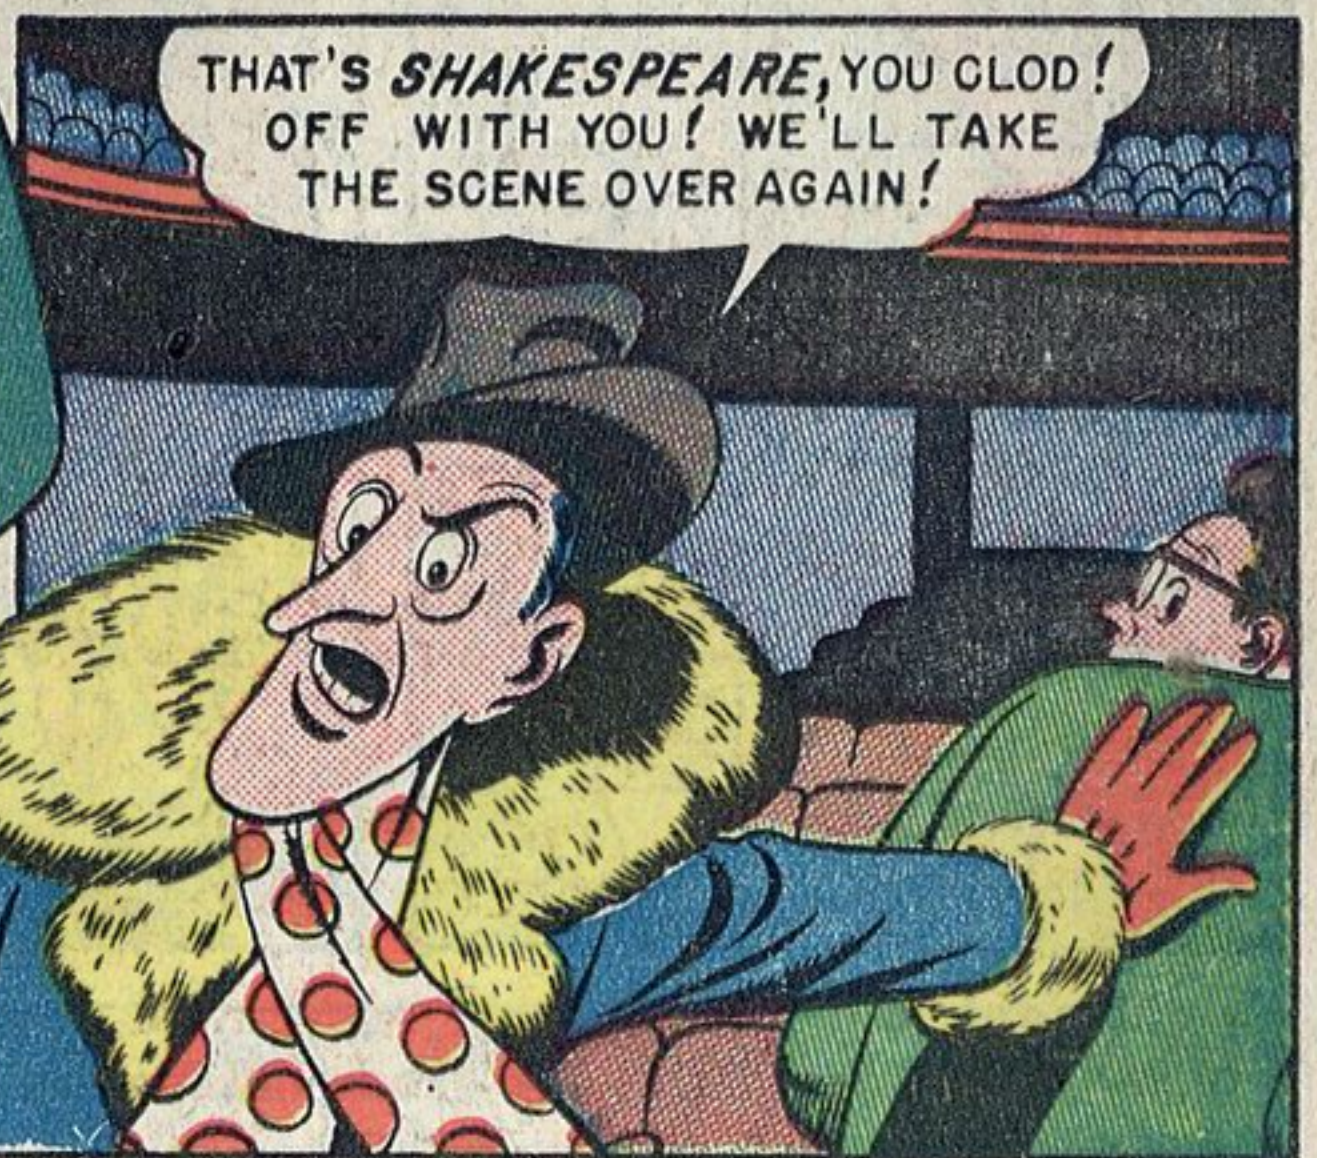

"You certainly did us a good turn, lady," said the detective. "But why didn't you go to work on him the moment you saw him?"

"Because I'd consulted the stars," she replied.

The detective stared uncomprehendingly.

"My horoscope," she explained. "According to the stars, I'd have bad luck today if I weren't careful. I must avoid it by hospitably entertaining the first stranger who came to my door. After I'd done that, I could see about arresting Nifty Neaps."
